Axis Mundi Tackles Psychology and the Environmental Apocalypse

SUSAN FROYD | SEPTEMBER 15, 2017 | 6:50AM

The psyche is vulnerable in ways we might never fully understand, and it makes sense that environmental concerns, now in overdrive, might mutate our gut reaction to them, en masse. Axis Mundi: Environmental Melancholia, Collective Social Mania and Biophilia, a complicated three-part group exhibition facilitated and mounted by artist Regan Rosburg and PlatteForum, follows those convoluted paths of modern eco-psychology through layers of art, science and our delicate symbiosis with nature.

Axis Mundi opens on Saturday, September 16, in the main exhibition space at PlatteForum, in the Temple, and spreads out to nearby satellite venues at the Land Library and the Olympic Building, comprising works by 21 artists overall.

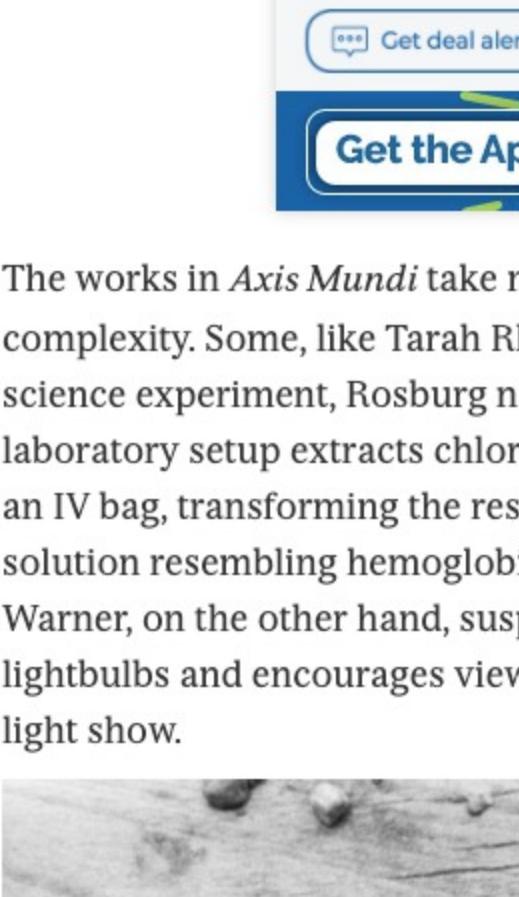

At the heart of the project is Rosburg's take that society is not properly digesting the effects of the world's current environmental swan dive.

"Axis Mundi approaches the whole idea of climate change, human involvement and changes happening around the planet – not from a place of hard information or science, but instead from the perspective of psychology," Rosburg elaborates. "But in spite of all the information we have about climate change, our mentality hasn't changed enough to change people's behavior."

Her theory of our society's psychological state is threefold. It begins with the onset of melancholia, a static mindset in need of release: "You don't truly mourn something until you go through the ceremony or symbol, like a dove release or burning a love letter," Rosburg explains. "Otherwise, your melancholia becomes stagnant, an unprocessed place where you get stuck. Unsolved melancholia then transitions into mania – addictions are common, or people are driven to consume and go shopping. Those two things, melancholia and mania, form an endless loop."

We never come to terms with our place in nature when the overwhelming evidence of human abuse looms large, she implies.

More than anything, Rosburg hopes the exhibit will spur healing conversations – and perhaps turn the eco-psychological circle of despair and acting out around. She thinks artists have the power to lead the way toward "finding one's way out of the circle intact and in tune with nature. It's the biggest contribution artists can do right now," she says. "We're only as sick as our secrets."
